Interdisciplinary Synergy:

The Medical/Dental Connection to a New Era of Healthcare

Oral diseases are a medical problem with a dental solution.

On average, 80% of American adults have some form of periodontal disease. Research reveals the association of periodontal disease to over 57 illnesses that can not only be treated but likely avoided through a whole body (comprehensive) approach to patient treatment.

Drawing from Hannah's Five to Thrive Approach, this presentation focuses on providing a roadmap for success to take action for integrated healthcare. Creating and communicating an energy to make change happen through a common vision and knowing that your message matters most will provide clarity and remove conflicts for patients, the team and the healthcare community. Discover how a culture dedicated to comprehensive care and whole-body health is an attainable opportunity for both the prevention of disease and the maintenance of health with a sense of urgency provided through relationships and education.

Improved patient care has the ability to be monitored and measured through the systematic implementation of processes that align with your vision and culture. The numbers don't lie; evaluate and reverse engineer to meet desired goals for whole body health as a team. As dental healthcare professionals you can underline the importance of whole-body health through interdisciplinary collaboration, bridging the gap and being the catalyst in the evolving paradigms of healthcare.

Transform your practice into a wellness center with well-educated patients, a well-developed interdisciplinary network of like-minded professionals, and an emphasis on health, exceptional dentistry and saving lives.
